in person Dryden & Digital Framework for teachers, homeschoolers and community leaders

We constantly hear people say that basic life skills should be taught early and often—things like growing food, preserving and living in harmony with nature. However, who is going to teach these things? Have we lost the wisdom keepers to transfer this knowledge?

Whether you're a teacher looking for an activity program this semester, a homeschooling parent ready to work with your children on practical skills or a community leader partnering with individuals and families to transfer knowledge—we've got your back.

Our seasonal lifestyle programs provide simple frameworks for important life skills that are rooted in caregiving, creativity and critical thinking. The aim of these programs is to breed resilient people focused on local production and self-sufficiency by breaking through the complexity in an easy to understand way. Individuals fostering a growth mindset, moving to take care of their innate needs will determine the strength of our local communities if times get tough.

With a degree in Recreation Management and Community Development, Bobbie Parr began Parrs Jars in 2020 to tackle the in-coming food security issue that would result from regulatory mismanagement during the pandemic. It became clear within the first year of operation that we needed to make a greater impact than on-farm production and food aggregation alone could offer—we needed to replicate that impact through educational opportunities. Help people grow themselves, their vegetables, their pantries and their resiliency.

After collaborating to found a new local food co-op to continue our initial objectives, we made the shift into education, training and rentals. Helping people gain a secure foundation to start their journey toward a more resilient lifestyle.
